JUVENILE LAW

What happens if a child is arrested?

A child may be arrested by the police and taken to a detention facility for children. The police officer must attempt to notify the child's parent or guardian. The detention facility where the child is being held must notify a probation officer and shall attempt to notify the child's parent or guardian.

In counties with populations at or over 100,000 people, a hearing must be held in juvenile court regarding the child's detention within 72 hours (excluding weekends and holidays). At the detention hearing, the juvenile court may decide to: release the child, release the child with certain conditions (for example, house arrest), or detain the child at the detention facility.

How are charges brought against children?

With few exceptions, juvenile courts have exclusive jurisdiction over kids under 18 who break the law. The District Attorney's office may file a petition against the juvenile alleging that he or she has committed a delinquent act. These proceedings are not criminal in nature.

Alternatively, a juvenile may be declared a "Child in Need of Supervision" if the juvenile breaks laws that govern children's behavior, such as: mandatory school attendance, curfew, running away from home or incorrigible behavior.

Is my child entitled to an attorney?

A juvenile alleged to be delinquent or in need of supervision is entitled to be presented by an attorney at all stages of the proceedings. Many times, the public defender's office is appointed to represent juveniles. However, juveniles or their parents may hire a private attorney to represent them in juvenile court.

How are juvenile cases handled by the court?

First, a petition is filed by the District Attorney's office alleging that a child has committed a delinquent act or is a child in need of supervision. A plea hearing is set for the child to answer the petition. A child may answer the petition with an admission or a denial. If the child denies the petition's allegations, then an adjudicatory hearing is held. An adjudicatory hearing is similar to a trial, where both the defense and prosecution call witnesses and present evidence and arguments. If a child admits the allegations of the petition or the petition is sustained after a trial, the judge will enter dispositional or sentencing orders.

What are potential dispositional orders?

Probationary supervision by the Department of Juvenile Services, which may include the following terms:

- Work crew or community services hours
- Individual or family counseling
- Participation in mental health or substance abuse treatment services (residential or out-patient)
- Random drug/alcohol testing and search and seizure for drugs/alcohol/weapons
- Driver's license suspension
- No gang activity
- Letter of apology
- Psychological or psychiatric evaluation
- Mandatory school clause
- Participation in classes run by the probation department aimed at developing skills in areas such as: victim awareness, family wellness, basic skills, job training or anger management
- Fines
- No contact orders with certain people or places
- Restitution to victim
- A commitment to the Division of Child and Family Services for a Correctional Placement

Will my child have a record?

Juvenile records are automatically sealed when the child reaches the age of 21. Or, records can be sealed earlier upon a child or probation officer's request three years after the child's last adjudication or referral to juvenile court (whichever is later).

Additionally, juvenile records may not be opened by anybody unless they get a court order and the court finds they have a legitimate interest in the records. There are exceptions for traffic violations that go to the DMV and if, as an adult, the division of parole and probation need the information to prepare a sentencing report for the adult criminal courts. There are also exceptions to both of the above categories if the juvenile delinquent act is a sex offense.

How do I find an attorney with experience in Juvenile matters?

The Public Defender's Office can assign an attorney, or you can contact the State Bar of Nevada's Lawyer Referral & Information Service at 702-382-0504 (toll-free in Nevada at 1-800-789-5747) or look in the yellow pages of your telephone directory. You can also ask friends and/or relatives if they can recommend a good lawyer. The State Bar's main office (see numbers listed below) can tell you whether or not an attorney is licensed in Nevada and in good standing.
